Excerpt: . . . on the top of the half crowns, and now there were but two. She looked, however, carefully through the pounds worth of silver, and under everything that lay on the table, and then all over the floor, before she would make any inquiries, but nowhere could she find it. Greatly distressed, she now rang the bell for Emma, who appeared in a moment. Emma, she said, you saw me count out this money, how did I place it Emma told her exactly. You saw the three half-sovereigns, then V Yes, Maam, laid on the half-crowns, she replied; I noticed it, for it was just the way the shopman counted them out for me. Well, Emma, one of these half-sovereigns has gone since I left the room, returned Mrs. Douglas, looking fully into her face. Can you give any account of it V though, while she spoke, she felt convinced of Emmas innocence. She had so often left money in her way before, and had never missed a halfpenny, and her jewellery had all been quite safe in Emmas care, so that she had learned to trust her with everything. No, Maam, she replied, quite firmly and simply, though colouring as she spoke. I left the room the moment after you did. But what can have become of it, Emma has any one been in the room V asked Mrs. Douglas. I do not know, Maam, for Ive been up-stairs, she replied. In the mean time, guessing what the bell was...
